Electrochemical cells generally have a negative electrode, a positive electrode, and an electrolyte disposed between the electrodes. The electrolyte is in ionic communication with the electrodes. In the manufacture of such cells, a separator is typically inserted between the electrodes prior to the assembly of the electrodes and electrolyte. The separator is disposed within an exterior casing, which is typically formed of an aluminum alloy. The casing is typically crimped to seal an opening through which the separator extends. In addition, a portion of the casing is deformed outwardly to form a sealing flange that abuts a negative electrode. Although the separator is intended to be hermetically sealed within the casing, a portion of the separator inevitably protrudes from the casing through the crimped portion. The portion of the separator protruding from the casing 77a5ca646e
